

The Peak District

The Peak District lies in the centre of Britain, it was designated the United Kingdom's first National Park in 1951 and has been attracting visitors drawn to its beautiful views ever since. Much of the parks area lies above 300m rising to 636m on Kinder Scout, so there is plenty of opportunity for commanding views, characterised by rolling hills and grit-stone escarpments.

There is a history of wool manufacturing in the area and remains of the narrow stone mills, often powered by water wheels, can be found in the river filled valleys. In the heart of the Park you will find the town of Buxton home to Buxton Spring Water, which exits the ground at a constant 28 degrees and is then exported all over the world. The town has many architectural nods to the spa town of Bath who with its healing waters was also responsible for attracting visitors over the centuries.
